Given a mobile app (React Native) which as the sole purpose is to input (read only, UI) some human information. This information must be stored somehow. For example in a MS SQL database. I am currently thinking in the following approach for storing this data, because it is rather static: The information gets transmitted via a REST-interface to a backend (JS Code) This JS Code executes on a server and returns the information in the form of a JSON-Object. The Information is then passed to React Native (Native Code) and translated in some kind of representation (e.g. JS Value) which is then given to the users (Application Specific UI). Conceptually this is a perfect scenario for dependency injection. It allows the application to be decoupled and allows the devs to just focus on the application without thinking about the database or the backend. Is this a good approach and how is dependency injection applied to this problem? Can you think of any improvements? A: You can use dependency injection to pass
